Question 05

Read the following passage and answer the questions.

English is spoken on all five continents. With regard to numbers of speakers it is only exceeded by Chinese (in its various forms) and Spanish. But in terms of geographical spread it stands at the top of the league. The distribution is a direct consequence of English colonial policy , starting Ireland in the late 12th century and counting well into 19th century , reaching its peak at the end of the reign of Queen Victoria and embodied in the saying ‘ the sun never sets on the British Empire .

The two main groups are Britain and America, For each there are standard forms of English which are used as yardsticks for comparing other varieties of the respective areas.

In the Britain standard is called Received Pronunciation. The term stems from Daniel Jones at the beginning of the present century and refers to the pronunciation of English which is accepted – that is , received – in English society. BBC English , Oxford English , Queen’s English (formerly king’s English) are alternative terms which are not favoured by linguists as they are imprecise or simply incorrect.

In America there is a standard which referred to by any of a number of titles , General American and Network American English being the two most common. There is a geographical area where this English is spoken and it is defined negatively as the rest of the United states outside of New England (the north east) and the south. General American is spoken by the majority of Americans , including many in the North – East and South and thus contrasts strongly with Received Pronunciation which is a prestige sociolect spoken by a few percent of all the British . The Southern United States occupy a unique position as the English characteristics of this area is found typically among the African American sections of the community. These are the descendents of the slaves originally imported into the Caribbean area , chiefly by the English from the 16th century onwards. Their English is quite different from that of the rest of the United States and has far more in common with that of the various Anglophone Caribbean islands.

The varieties of English both in Europe and overseas tend to show variation in certain key features , for instance special verbal structures to express aspectual distinctions are common to nearly all varieties in the developing world. Pronunciation and morphology features can equally be classified according to frequency of variation in non – standard forms of the language. The first is the presence of archaic words no longer found in mainland Britain , e.g. the use of bold in the sense of misbehaved or wench as a non – derogative term for woman . The second type contains flora and fauna words. Obviously those speakers of English who moved to new environments were liable to borrow words from indigenous languages for phenomena in nature which they did not know from Europe , thus Australian English has koala, kangaroo, New Zealand English kiwi, etc.
