Question 6

Read the passage and answer the questions given below.

America dominates consumer goods brands. Here, wealthy consumers have supported Apple, Google, Coca-Cola, Microsoft, and countless other companies. Many of those brands then spread around the world.

But American brands are slowly losing their place in the global marketplace. From Samsung to Toyota to Mercedes Benz, companies in Europe and Asia are creating top-quality goods and selling them as such rather than competing on price. "There are longer-term trends toward greater competition. The United States was the only global brand country [but] that's no longer the case," says Earl L. Taylor, chief marketing officer of the Marketing Science Institute. "Consumers prefer brands that they take to be of higher quality" regardless of the country of origin, he notes. "Increasingly, there will be other successful global brands in the U.S. [market]."

Of the brands at the top of Interbrand's recent list of the world's most valuable, four of the top five still originate in the United States; the five most valuable are Apple, Google, Coca-Cola, and Microsoft, while Toyota (Japan) comes in at number five. American companies have lost the most ground in the middle tier of recognizable brand names, says George T. Haley, professor of marketing at the University of New Haven's School of Business.

One area from which U.S. brands are feeling the pressure is the Asia-Pacific region, which harbors the fastest-growing markets today. In the kitchen appliance category, two Chinese companies, Haier and Kelon, are becoming top competitors for well-known U.S. brands Whirlpool and Maytag. In fact, Haier bought the American company GE's appliance division in 2016. The Chinese branding trend is not confined only to large goods. Sporting goods and sportswear brand Li Ning, well known within China, is building its international profile. While the Chinese basketball team wore Nike uniforms at the Athens Olympic Games, the Spanish team wore Li Ning apparel. The threat to U.S. brands is not restricted to China, however. South Korean brands, such as Samsung, LG, and Hyundai, have emerged on the global stage in specific categories, such as smartphones, household appliances, and automobiles.

In Europe, the weakened relationship with the United States has translated into a preference for European or even Asian brands at the expense of U.S. brands. Plus, experts say, European brands are simply becoming stronger and more consistent.

Meanwhile, European brands are gaining momentum in the areas of consumer goods, putting the pressure on well-known U.S. brands, experts say. For instance, Gaggenau is a popular, high-end European kitchen appliance brand, along with Bosch and Dyson. Other European brands maintaining a strong positive reputation—if not always with the allure of luxury—include Absolut Vodka, Virgin Airlines, Mini Cooper, Red Bull, and Ikea.
